The way we see it, the Internet is a vast electronic jungle crawling with all sorts of benign and malicious creatures. But with almost two billion websites out there, how on earth do you spot the bad guys and their nasty tricks?

SOLUTION
For starters, you have WHOIS. It's a database that contains the identifiable records of all websites and their owners that operate on the Web. By leveraging these records, a reverse WHOIS service allows you to search the database for clues to sinister characters and sites.

Now, this is where WHOISOLOGY comes in. By inputting a domain term — say, the name of a brand — into our Reverse WHOIS search tool, you'll get a slew of intelligence information.

From the results, you can click from one data field to the next, retracing the deep and toxic connections for intercepting bad actors and their nefarious networks in order to:

- Sharpen corporate intelligence
- Monitor competitors’ next moves
- Avoid intellectual property infringements
- Jumpstart cybercrime investigations
- Assist law enforcement
- Find journalistic scoops
- Create innovative business tactics
What is WHOISOLOGY?

We are, first of all, a domain name ownership archive with billions of searchable and cross-referenced domain name WHOIS records. Imagine a humongous library of domain information where you can have fun (and shivers, once you uncover the bad plots) just nosing around.

Our main focus is Reverse WHOIS – you know, working backwards using full investigation tools to gather actionable information for use in cybercrime investigation, corporate intelligence, legal research, and business development. We’re very serious about what we do and have elevated it to some kind of science, thus our name.
